

The next speaker was Mr. REMOND of Salem, who said he should not speak again if he did now know there were certain persons who did not want him to speak. He denounced the "Uncle Tom school" of anti-slavery men, as too forbearing and cringing. New [comers] might inquire what they expected to do here? He would tell them there was not only sympathy here, but electricity that would be felt all over the country. He believed the Dred Scott decision preceded the reopening of the slave trade, and he did not object to the reopening of that trade if it would hasten a crisis. He had been blamed for not going into the political [scramble] for their rights; but let his friends look at the great parties of the land and see what they had done for the rights of the colored man. Let the colored man repose upon his assured rights, and avail himself of them by a calm and determined front. He would have it as his record that he was a traitor to the Government, the Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court of this country and would abide the consequences.

The next speaker was Mr. REMOND of Salem, who said he should not speak again if he did not know there were certain persons who did not want him to speak. He denounced the "Uncle Tom school" of anti-slavery men, as too forbearing and cringing. Newcomers might inquire what they expected to do here? He would tell them there was not only sympathy here, but electricity that would be felt all over the country. He believed the Dred Scott decision preceded the reopening of the slave trade, and he did not object to the reopening of that trade if it would hasten a crisis. He had been blamed for not going into the political scramble for their rights; but let his friends look at the great parties of the land and see what they had done for the rights of the colored man. Let the colored man repose upon his assured rights, and avail himself of them by a calm and determined front. He would have it as his record that he was a traitor to the Government, the Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court of this country and would abide the consequences.