

Mr. Brown presented himself as a slave under the U. S. Constitution, which instrument now held three millions of his brethren and sisters in cruel bondage. He was glad to enjoy the opportunity of addressing the working men, the class which the slave power would reduce to a level with its sable victims. The laboring people of the south, whether black or white, were in a degraded condition. He hoped the working men of the north would calculate the nature of this union with the slaveholder, and detailed many features of the soul-destroying system which crushed to the earth so many men women and children. Mr. Brown had lately visited Croton Heights, in Connecticut, where is a monument erected to those who fell in 1781, in the attack on New London, but the names of the colored men are colonized apart from the white men, an evidence of the pro-slavery feeling then existing among those who were sacrificing so much for their own rights.—W. C. N.

Mr. Brown presented himself as a slave under the U. S. Constitution, which instrument now held three millions of his brethren and sisters in cruel bondage. He was glad to enjoy the opportunity of addressing the working men, the class which the slave power would reduce to a level with its sable victims. The laboring people of the south, whether black or white, were in a degraded condition. He hoped the working men of the north would calculate the nature of this union with the slaveholder, and detailed many features of the soul-destroying system which crushed to the earth so many men women and children. Mr. Brown had lately visited Croton Heights, in Connecticut, where is a monument erected to those who fell in 1781, in the attack on New London, but the names of the colored men are colonized apart from the white men, an evidence of the pro-slavery feeling then existing among those who were sacrificing so much for their own rights.—W. C. N.