

The first speaker introduced was JOHN PARKER, recently in the rebel service. He had been an American slave, and had but recently, only three years ago, made his escape. He is of unmixed African blood. He gave forcible expression to his hearty detestation of slavery, and of those amphibious creatures, Northern men with Southern principles. The negro, he thought, was in an unfortunate position, disliked and oppressed by both parties. His race wanted justice and liberty, and they would be thankful to any one, Northern or Southern, who would grant them these. He gave some details of his personal and family history, and replied to some of the current apologies for slavery. He rejoiced in the reformation of Gen. Butler from partisan democracy to practical abolitionism. He made impressive reference to the injustice yet practised against the colored people in the city of Philadelphia, and rejoiced in the patient and unrevenged disposition of that race, in spite of the gross cruelties which they had suffered. He had been compelled to assist in building the fortifications of Richmond, but he thought the greatest strength of the rebellion lay in the divisions of opinion among Northern men in regard to slavery.

The first speaker introduced was JOHN PARKER, recently in the rebel service. He had been an American slave, and had but recently, only three years ago, made his escape. He is of unmixed African blood. He gave forcible expression to his hearty detestation of slavery, and of those amphibious creatures, Northern men with Southern principles. The negro, he thought, was in an unfortunate position, disliked and oppressed by both parties. His race wanted justice and liberty, and they would be thankful to any one, Northern or Southern, who would grant them these. He gave some details of his personal and family history, and replied to some of the current apologies for slavery. He rejoiced in the reformation of Gen. Butler from partisan democracy to practical abolitionism. He made impressive reference to the injustice yet practised against the colored people in the city of Philadelphia, and rejoiced in the patient and unrevenged disposition of that race, in spite of the gross cruelties which they had suffered. He had been compelled to assist in building the fortifications of Richmond, but he thought the greatest strength of the rebellion lay in the divisions of opinion among Northern men in regard to slavery.