

The Chairman then referred to some colored patriots, who were discouraged by white Copperheads, but had applied to Governor Morgan for permission to form a regiment when the war first broke out, but the Governor could not give his sanction, not having the power. He was certain that at least 1600 young colored men were now in the service of the United States as menials, who would have been soldiers instead, had they been allowed to enlist. Some of these young men had returned minus an eye, an arm or a leg, from wounds received in action. They did what they could, but could not get the opportunity to do enough. He gave it as his candid opinion, that now was the time for his colored fellow-citizens to come forward, and strike a blow for the Union and for freedom. The history of the black man was being written, and the page would doubtless be bright and glorious at the close of the war. His advice to the young men of New York was to be careful in all their actions and words, for there are men watching all your words to find some means of slandering you. Join the armies of the united States, and, in the language of old John Brown, who frightened Virginia to the core, march through and through the heart of this rebellion. (Cheers.)
