

[On Tuesday evening we attended a public meeting in Little Pine street, to listen to Prof. Charles Reason of the N. Y. Central College. The audience was large and intelligent, composed of all colors; the Rev. Mr. Post was first-introduced to the meeting, who gave a brief outline of the origin of the institution, and the principles and character of its projectors, after which Mr. Reason came forward and said that Dr. Peck had offered to introduce him, but he considered the position he had the honor to occupy, and his identification with the audience before him was a sufficient introduction for him on the present occasion:] Mr. Reason went on to describe the locality of this college, the appearance of the surrounding country, the dimensions of the buildings, the peculiar advantages over any other institution of the kind in the country, he dwelt a length upon the moral advantages to be derived in this over any other in the country; Mr. R. urged upon the people present to give this institution their countenance and support.

On Tuesday evening we attended a public meeting in Little Pine street, to listen to Prof. Charles Reason of the N. Y. Central College. The audience was large and intelligent, composed of all colors; the Rev. Mr. Post was first-introduced to the meeting, who gave a brief outline of the origin of the institution, and the principles and character of its projectors, after which Mr. Reason came forward and said that Dr. Peck had offered to introduce him, but he considered the position he had the honor to occupy, and his identification with the audience before him was a sufficient introduction for him on the present occasion: Mr. Reason went on to describe the locality of this college, the appearance of the surrounding country, the dimensions of the buildings, the peculiar advantages over any other institution of the kind in the country, he dwelt a length upon the moral advantages to be derived in this over any other in the country; Mr. R. urged upon the people present to give this institution their countenance and support.