

William Andrew Jackson, the escaped coachman of Jefferson Davis, addressed the meeting in support of the resolution, and was received with immense applause. After expressing his gratitude for the hearty welcome tendered to him, he said he had lived twenty-nine years and six months in slavery, and was just thirty years of age. He had experienced both good and bad usage, but had from his earliest days longed to gain his freedom. It was false to say that the slaves as a class did not desire freedom. They had been praying for years for the election of an abolitionist for President. Hundreds and thousands had escaped since Mr. Lincoln came into office. Jefferson Davis had hired him of a Mr. W. A. Tyler as coachman, at the rate of 250 dollars a-year, and had given security for [800] dollars in the event of his escaping. That money would have to be paid if he did not return on the 25th of the present month. He had written to Jefferson Davis, telling him he was sorry to put him to the trouble of paying the money, as he knew money was very scarce in the South. He also told him that he had not taken a drop of intoxicating drink since he had been in England—proving that, though a slave, he was able to take care of himself. He asked for the sympathy of Englishmen on behalf of his brethren in bondage, and of those who were fighting for their freedom. He look forward to the 1st of January as a day of jubilee. (The above is a mere outline of Jackson's speech, which, though delivered in a thorough genuine negro manner, indicated the possession of no small amount of common sense, intelligence, and humour.)

William Andrew Jackson, the escaped coachman of Jefferson Davis, addressed the meeting in support of the resolution, and was received with immense applause. After expressing his gratitude for the hearty welcome tendered to him, he said he had lived twenty-nine years and six months in slavery, and was just thirty years of age. He had experienced both good and bad usage, but had from his earliest days longed to gain his freedom. It was false to say that the slaves as a class did not desire freedom. They had been praying for years for the election of an abolitionist for President. Hundreds and thousands had escaped since Mr. Lincoln came into office. Jefferson Davis had hired him of a Mr. W. A. Tyler as coachman, at the rate of 250 dollars a-year, and had given security for 300 dollars in the event of his escaping. That money would have to be paid if he did not return on the 25th of the present month. He had written to Jefferson Davis, telling him he was sorry to put him to the trouble of paying the money, as he knew money was very scarce in the South. He also told him that he had not taken a drop of intoxicating drink since he had been in England—proving that, though a slave, he was able to take care of himself. He asked for the sympathy of Englishmen on behalf of his brethren in bondage, and of those who were fighting for their freedom. He looked forward to the 1st of January as a day of jubilee. [The above is a mere outline of Jackson's speech, which, though delivered in a thorough genuine negro manner, indicated the possession of no small amount of common sense, intelligence, and humour.]