

Rev. Mr. Scott followed with an address. He commenced by practically refuting the flimsy tenets of the slaveholder, that the slave, when free could not take care of himself. The speaker thought differently, and, raising himself to a dignified height, he wished all present to behold a practical refutation of the slaveholder's doctrine. (Mr. Scott is blessed with an abundance of muscle and backbone.) He then referred to his own escape from slavery, and related that touching story of his youth[ful] bondage with which we are all more or less [similar]. His appeals to the affection of parents [whose] children might be treated as he had been,—were truly affecting. He concluded by reminding all present that he had a little barking dog at home which would also bite; and, though a [ministros] of the Gospel, he would use it if occasion required,—and advised others to do the same. Mr. Scott was frequently applauded.

Rev. Mr. Scott followed with an address. He commenced by practically refuting the flimsy tenets of the slaveholder, that the slave, when free could not take care of himself. The speaker thought differently, and, raising himself to a dignified height, he wished all present to behold a practical refutation of the slaveholder's doctrine. (Mr. Scott is blessed with an abundance of muscle and backbone.) He then referred to his own escape from slavery, and related that touching story of his youthful bondage with which we are all more or less similar. His appeals to the affections of parents whose children might be treated as he had been,—were truly affecting. He concluded by reminding all present that he had a little barking dog at home which would also bite; and, though a minister of the Gospel, he would use it if occasion required,—and advised others to do the same. Mr. Scott was frequently applauded.