

[A lecture on the affairs at the South was delivered on Thursday evening, 19th inst., at the Metropolitan Rooms, 178 Prince St., by William Jones, a runaway slave. The Hall was crowded to its most capacity, and each person was waiting patiently for the speaker to arrive, when a gentleman came in and stated that the hall they were then in not being large enough to accommodate all that were anxious to hear the speaker, he had engaged the hall below, and those wishing to procure seats had better go at once down, when the once quietly seated audience made a rush for the door; but on reaching the lower apartment they found they had to remain standing until benches were brought in, and some very eager to get seated commenced seating themselves on benches while in the janitor's hands.] At last they were once more seated, and in a short time the speaker came in, in company with the gentleman, Mr. Henry Jones, who assisted him in effecting his escape. The slave told the story of his birth, his masters, and all concerning himself, from the time he first thought of being a free-man, until he found himself safe among the "Yankees," as he termed the Federal troops. He made some excellent remarks, on of which was that before running away he secreted on his person a revolver and bowie

A lecture on the affairs at the South was delivered on Thursday evening, 19th inst., at the Metropolitan Rooms, 178 Prince St., by William Jones, a runaway slave. The Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, and each person was waiting patiently for the speaker to arrive, when a gentleman came in and stated that the hall they were then in not being large enough to accommodate all that were anxious to hear the speaker, he had engaged the hall below, and those wishing to procure seats had better go at once down, when the once quietly seated audience made a rush for the door; but on reaching the lower apartment they found they had to remain standing until benches were brought in, and some very eager to get seated commenced seating themselves on benches while in the janitor's hands. At last they were once more seated, and in a short time the speaker came in, in company with the gentleman, Mr. Henry Jones, who assisted him in effecting his escape. The slave told the story of his birth, his masters, and all concerning himself, from the time he first thought of being a free-man, until he found himself safe among the "Yankees," as he termed the Federal troops. He made some excellent remarks, one of which was that before running away he secreted on his person a revolver and bowie knife, in case he came across a Secessionist, and if he were to be taken back he should be taken dead (applause). He also stated that in the vicinity from which he came the slaves had made up their minds to become freemen, and that their intentions were, if called upon by their masters to fight for the Confederacy; they would accept their arms, and as soon as command was given to "fire," they would wheel round and kill their masters—then run to the "Yankees" (applause). He seems to be quite an intelligent young man for one being born a slave, altho' he has no education whatever. He related his story in a manner that would reflect credit upon one that had received education from boyhood. TREBLA

knife, in case he came across a Secessionist, and if he were to be taken back he should be taken dead (applause). He also stated that in the vicinity from which he came the slaves had made up their minds to become freemen, and that their intentions were, if called upon by their masters to fight for the Confederacy; they would accept their arms, and as soon as command was given to "fire," they would wheel round and kill their masters—then run to the "Yankees" (applause). He seems to be quite an intelligent young man for one being born a slave, altho' he has no education whatever. He related his story in a manner that would reflect credit upon one that had received education from boyhood. TREBLA