

W. W. BROWN said that prejudice against color originated in slave States, because slavery exists there.

'When going out to England in the steamer,' said he, 'I was looked down upon. I went to Ireland, and remained some fifteen days, and then went to Paris, to attend the World's Peace Convention, to which I was a delegate, and found many of my fellow-passengers there. I waited upon Victor Hugo, and was very cordially treated by him. One of those men, who had never spoken to me, and never meant to do so, came up to me and said, "How do you do, Mr. Brown?"'

(Laughter.) I told him he had the advantage of me. He told me he was a fellow-passenger, and added, "Will you not introduce me to Victor Hugo?" I replied that I did not feel at liberty to introduce to Hugo persons whom I knew nothing about. At the soiree, I was introduced to the Minister, and when he was told that I was an American fugitive slave, he asked to be introduced a second time, which was done. He conducted me to his lady, with whom I conversed above an hour. Judge Walsh and others looked darkly at me, but it did not deter him from treating me courteously . . . Get out from under the stars and stripes, and prejudice against color is not known. It is prejudice against condition, not color; only the color is a mark to instance the condition.'

W. W. BROWN said that prejudice against color originated in slave States, because slavery exists there. 'When going out to England in the steamer,' said he, 'I was looked down upon. I went to Ireland, and remained some fifteen days, and then went to Paris, to attend the World's Peace Convention, to which I was a delegate, and found many of my fellow-passengers there. I waited upon Victor Hugo, and was very cordially treated by him. One of those men, who had never spoken to me, and never meant to do so, came up to me and said, "How do you do, Mr. Brown?"' (Laughter.) I told him he had the advantage of me. He told me he was a fellow-passenger, and added, "Will you not introduce me to Victor Hugo?" I replied that I did not feel at liberty to introduce to Hugo persons whom I knew nothing about. At the soiree, I was introduced to the Minister, and when he was told that I was an American fugitive slave, he asked to be introduced a second time, which was done. He conducted me to his lady, with whom I conversed above an hour. Judge Walsh and others looked darkly at me, but it did not deter him from treating me courteously. . . . Get out from under the stars and stripes, and prejudice against color is not known. It is prejudice against condition, not color; only the color is a mark to instance the condition.'