

[Enthusiastic meetings are being held in Boston, Springfield, New Bedford, and throughout the New England States, in promotion of enlistments. At one of the early gatherings in New Bedford, Rev. L. A. Grimes, of Boston, was called, and gave utterance as follows, eliciting the heartiest demonstrations of approval:—]

He urged the duty of colored men to respond in the call of the Governor. They had heretofore offered their services, and they had been refused. They had sought an opportunity to fight, but without avail. Now they were called upon to take up arms, and they should not hesitate for a moment. The speaker then alluded to the change which a year had effected in the prospects of this race, and spoke eloquently of the act of January last. He then fully answered the assertions that colored men would not fight and ought not to fight, stating instances of their courage and daring as soldiers, insisting that they had, in some sense, more at stake than even the whites in this war, and should, therefore, engage in it. He replied to the objection that colored men would not enlist under white officers, by remarking that so soon as they showed their ability to lead, their promotion was assured; that Governor Andrew would recognize the merit, as he had the rights of black men. After referring to the necessities of the service, and expressing his belief that colored men were to be the salvation of the country, he closed by calling on his hearers to rally to its defence. He was willing to go. He would take his Bible, and go with them; and, if need be, would not refuse to take the musket.

Enthusiastic meetings are being held in Boston, Springfield, New Bedford, and throughout the New England States, in promotion of enlistments. At one of the early gatherings in New Bedford, Rev. L. A. Grimes, of Boston, was called, and gave utterance as follows, eliciting the heartiest demonstrations of approval:—

He urged the duty of colored men to respond to the call of the Governor. They had heretofore offered their services, and they had been refused. They had sought an opportunity to fight, but without avail. Now they were called upon to take up arms, and they should not hesitate a moment. The speaker then alluded to the change which a year had effected in the prospects of his race, and spoke eloquently of the act of January last. He then fully answered the assertions that colored men would not fight and ought not to fight, stating instances of their courage and daring as soldiers, insisting that they had, in some sense, more at stake than even the whites in this war, and should, therefore, engage in it. He replied to the objection that colored men would not enlist under white officers, by remarking that so soon as they showed their ability to lead, their promotion was assured; that Governor Andrew would recognize the merit, as he had the rights of black men. After referring to the necessities of the service, and expressing his belief that colored men were to be the salvation of the country, he closed by calling on his hearers to rally to its defence. He was willing to go. He would take his Bible, and go with them; and, if need be, would not refuse to take the musket.