

MR. CHAIRMAN: No man can doubt that I share largely in the feeling that has called us together; nor can I doubt that any person acquainted with me will feel that whenever and wherever I can say a word calculated to advance the glorious cause of anti-slavery, I am not disposed to decline doing so. But I do not see how, under the circumstances, I could hope, without the exhibition of a very large vanity indeed, to increase the interest which I trust has been already secured upon this occasion. I glory, sir, I confess, in common with my friends upon this platform, in the auspices under which we have come together this evening; and I think I know our friend and guest, Parker Pillsbury, sufficiently well to hazard the expression of unfeigned gratitude from every slave and from every nominally free man of colour in this country towards him (loud cheers). In the trial hour, and in the sunshine, as far as my observation and hearing are concerned, I have always found him true and faithful. And it strikes me, in view of the odium which rests upon the coloured people of this country, in the direction of chivalry, of heroism, of patriotism, of humanity and manly courage and nobility of soul, I cannot express a higher compliment towards our friend than to say, in the name of the coloured people of this country, that he is their faithful friend at all times and under all circumstances (cheers). I do believe, and I think I am not extravagant when I say, that it requires as much courage to stand up in the United States at the present day, and be the unflinching friend of the despised black man, whether North or South, as was required at the hands of Joseph Warren and his coadjutors to take the stand they did in the struggles of the Revolution (applause). These being my feelings, I shall take my seat by saying, that while I welcome as heartily and unqualifiedly as any man

MR. CHAIRMAN : No man can doubt that I share largely in the feeling that has called us together ; nor can I doubt that any person acquainted with me will feel that whenever and wherever I can say a word calculated to advance the glorious cause of anti-slavery, I am not disposed to decline doing so. But I do not see how, under the circumstances, I could hope, without the exhibition of a very large vanity indeed, to increase the interest which I trust has been already secured upon this occasion. I glory, sir, I confess, in common with my friends upon this platform, in the auspices under which we have come together this evening ; and I think I know our friend and guest, Parker Pillsbury, sufficiently well to hazard the expression of unfeigned gratitude from every slave and from every nominally free man of colour in this country towards him (loud cheers). In the trial hour, and in the sunshine, as far as my observation and hearing are concerned, I have always found him true and faithful. And it strikes me, in view of the odium which rests upon the coloured people of this country, in the direction of chivalry, of heroism, of patriotism, of humanity and manly courage and nobility of soul, I cannot express a higher compliment towards our friend than to say, in the name of the coloured people of this country, that he is their faithful friend at all times and under all circumstances (cheers). I do believe, and I think I am not extravagant when I say, that it requires as much courage to stand up in the United States at the present day, and be the unflinching friend of the despised black man, whether North or South, as was required at the hands of Joseph Warren and his coadjutors to take the stand they did in the struggles of the Revolution (applause). These being my feelings, I shall take my seat by saying, that while I welcome as heartily and unqualifiedly as any man can do our friend Parker Pillsbury, I do see cause to rejoice in much that is calculated to strengthen the hands of our friends and make strong their hearts in the number and character of the persons who have assembled here this evening, not only to give the right hand of fellowship to our friend, but to commit themselves to the most radical phase of anti-slavery, and whose motto is, "No Union, religiously or politically, with the scoundrel portion of the slaveholding American people" (loud cheers).

Mr. Chairman, I can only say, in conclusion, may God hasten the day when the citizens of Massachusetts shall have it in their power to say, that through their exertions, the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the land of Adams, and Otis, and Warren, shall be at least as sacred to the cause of liberty, and to the footsteps of the hunted fugitive, as the soil of Canada, over which presides Queen Victoria (cheers); and until we can say this of the Old Bay State, all our eulogies upon the men who fought the battles of the Revolution, all the associations which cluster around this Hall, the very reminiscences of Bunker Hill scenes, are as so many idle sounds. We owe it to the men who fought and died for impartial liberty, to make Massachusetts true to the principles which they established by their advocacy and by their blood. We owe it to ourselves, just in proportion as we vindicate and honour their course, to see to it that not many months shall roll round before Massachusetts shall dare to do so much for the cause of liberty in this Union as the contemptible State of South Carolina dares to do for the cause of slavery (applause). And if we have not manliness, and courage, and heroism enough to do this, never, in God's name, let us boast of our State, at home or abroad! (Cheers.)

can do our friend Parker Pillsbury, I do see cause to rejoice in much that is calculated to strengthen the hands of our friends and make strong their hearts in the number and character of the persons who have assembled here this evening, not only to give the right hand of fellowship to our friend, but to commit themselves to the most radical phase of anti-slavery, and whose motto is, "No Union, religiously or politically, with the scoundrel portion of the slaveholding American people" (loud cheers).

Mr. Chairman, I can only say, in conclusion, may God hasten the day when the citizens of Massachusetts shall have it in their power to say, that through their exertions, the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the land of Adams, and Otis, and Warren, shall be at least as sacred to the cause of liberty, and to the footsteps of the hunted fugitive, as the soil of Canada, over which presides Queen Victoria (cheers); and until we can say this of the Old Bay State, all our eulogies upon the men who fought the battles of the Revolution, all the associations which cluster around this Hall, the very reminiscences of Bunker Hill scenes, are as so many idle sounds. We owe it to the men who fought and died for impartial liberty, to make Massachusetts true to the principles which they established by their advocacy and by their blood. We owe it to ourselves, just in proportion as we vindicate and honour their course, to see to it that not many months shall roll round before Massachusetts shall dare to do so much for the cause of liberty in this Union as the contemptible State of South Carolina dares to do for the cause of slavery (applause). And if we have not manliness, and courage, and heroism enough to do this, never, in God's name, let us boast of our State, at home or abroad! (Cheers.)