

"The Lecture of Mrs. Watkins Harper, a colored lady, at Dr. Revel's Church, (colored.) last night, was listened to by a full house and was throughout entertaining and instructive. Seldom have we heard a more cogent, forcible, and eloquent lecture upon any subject, especially from a woman. Her subject was: 'The Mission of the War,' and its treatment discovered an amount of accurate thought, close investigation, extensive reading, and withal a comprehension of liberty and Republicanism remarkable in any woman, no matter what her color. The character and influence of slavery and the slave-power, its desperation and suicidal policy, the pro-slavery war policy and measures of the National Government, its slow awakening to a conviction of its error, its final comprehension of the question and magnitude of the work and just measures, were all clearly discussed. The future of the nation, conditions of reconstruction, the relation of the blacks to that future were canvassed with clear and cogent logic and appeal, and through all was traced the progress of the idea of liberation to the slave. She closed with an earnest appeal for a national recognition of the colored man as a freeman and citizen."

"The Lecture of Mrs. Watkins Harper, a colored lady, at Dr. Revels' Church, (colored.) last night, was listened to by a full house, and was throughout entertaining and instructive. Seldom have we heard a more cogent, forcible, and eloquent lecture upon any subject, especially from a woman. Her subject was: 'The Mission of the War,' and its treatment discovered an amount of accurate thought, close investigation, extensive reading, and withal a comprehension of liberty and Republicanism remarkable in any woman, no matter what her color. The character and influence of slavery and the slave-power, its desperation and suicidal policy, the pro-slavery war policy and measures of the National Government, its slow awakening to a conviction of its error, its final comprehension of the question and magnitude of the work and just measures, were all clearly discussed. The future of the nation, conditions of reconstruction, the relation of the blacks to that future were canvassed with clear and cogent logic and appeal, and through all was traced the progress of the idea of liberation to the slave. She closed with an earnest appeal for a national recognition of the colored man as a freeman and citizen."