

Mr. DOWNING then said that he had nothing to remark but that these resolutions, though strong, were the sentiments of his heart, and he declared that whenever he saw the 'panting slave' he would assist him by every means in his power. (A voice.—And so will the white men, too.) Mr. D. continued.—We have to come to this determination—to die, or to teach the individual who undertakes to carry out the provisions of this bill, that his life is in danger. I am a father, and bound by every tie to protect my wife and children, and here I declare that if any man—any found in human shape—dare to cross the threshold of my castle, I'll send him to h—ll before he shall accomplish his mission. Vociferous cheers.) I have used that harsh word because I do believe that any one who engages in such a mission is a servant of the d—l, and dying in that service he must go to h—ll. (Cheers.) By the provisions of the bill, I might be liable to be seized. And suppose I am not, how many are there here who do not hold as prominent a position as I do, and who may be held liable to the bill? With them I feel. (Hear, hear.) I call on you, not to go out to battle, but to arm yourselves for liberty. Mr. Downing concluded by reading a letter which the committee had sent to Horace Greeley, asking him to explain some matters with respect to the course of President Fillmore on the question, but which Mr. Greeley, for reasons best known to himself, had not answered.

Mr. DOWNING then said that he had nothing to remark but that these resolutions, though strong, were the sentiments of his heart, and he declared that whenever he saw the "panting slave" he would assist him by every means in his power. (A voice.—And so will the white men, too.) Mr. D. continued.—We have to come to this determination—to die, or to teach the individual who undertakes to carry out the provisions of this bill, that his life is in danger. I am a father, and bound by every tie to protect my wife and children, and here I declare that if any man—any found in human shape—dare to cross the threshold of my castle, I'll send him to h—ll before he shall accomplish his mission. Vociferous cheers.) I have used that harsh word because I do believe that any one who engages in such a mission is a servant of the d—l, and dying in that service he must go to h—ll. (Cheers.) By the provisions of the bill, I might be liable to be seized. And suppose I am not, how many are there here who do not hold as prominent a position as I do, and who may be made liable to the bill? With them I feel. (Hear, hear.) I call on you, not to go out to battle, but to arm yourselves for liberty. Mr. Downing concluded by reading a letter which the committee had sent to Horace Greeley, asking him to explain some matters with respect to the course of President Fillmore on the question, but which Mr. Greeley, for reasons best known to himself, had not answered.