Prof. Geo. B. Vashon was called up and introduced by the President. The Professor said that he was not prepared to make a set speech and thought it best for the audience to excuse him, but as they insisted upon his saying something and as he thought no one could be present in such an assembly as this without feeling some degree of inspiration he would present such thoughts as naturally arose in his mind.

He said that we had come together in this Convention to present our claim for equal and impartial liberty, that principle of liberty which is instilled in every man at his birth, that spirit, which is common to every human breast, that freedom which is desired by all men, whether they be the fur-clad citizen of the polar regions or the swarthy children, blackened by the sun of the tropics. The sentiment, "that whatever interests mankind, as such interests me," was the sentiment uttered by a slave, and it makes an echo in the heart of every man to-day. It was that sentiment which brought the echo from Russia, England and all Europe.

The speaker said that the American people might become great and powerful,—they might be able to count the whole continent as theirs,—and see no inch of soil not dotted by villages or other marks of civilized life,—their scholars may look in their reach to the limit of human knowledge and become almost creative in their grasp of intellect,—but if their government be not founded and administered in justice and equity, if the people did not enjoy impartial liberty and equality before the law, there was nothing secure or permanent in this country.

He thought, if it were necessary, that we would come together every year until our complete enfranchisement were secured. If we should die while making the effort, let us remember the words of Byron, 11

They never fail who die in a just cause.

But he believed we were nearing the good time when all men throughout the broad expanse of this country would enjoy equal legal and political privileges and immunities.

The address was eloquently delivered and listened to with the utmost attention by the vast audience, except when interrupted by applause.

Fref. Cao. b. Number was called up and introduced by the Procedent. The Prefencer and that he was not property to make a set speech and thought it best for the ambience to encuse him, but as they instance upon his asyming according and as he thought no one could be present to seek as assembly as this sittout feeling seem deprice of importation he would present such throught as according seems in his sind.

Be said that we had come together in this Convention to present our class for equal and important liberty, that principle of liberty which is fontilled in every may so his hirth, that spirit, which is domino to every homes broad, that fraction which is dominod by all may, whether they be the frequent shallow of the palar regions or the warring delice, bindered by the sam of the troptes. The santinum, "that whather interests marked, as such interests of every may to day." It was that continued which is able to control to the boart of sevry may to day. It was that continued which have the broaden of the lower for the santinum and all Europe.

The repulsed and forcept.

Englind and all Encope.

The speaker and that the American people might become great and power-lat,—they might be shie to deant the shole residence as theirs,—and see as lack of soil not desired by alliages or other marks of civilined life,—their acholane me look in their reach is the limit of huma involving and become almost evention in their group of sacolbert,—but if their government be not important and administrated to jestice and equity, if the people did not enjoy important liberty and equality before the less, these was nothing secure of corrupting in this consisty.

Be thought, if it were mercessary, that we would come together every year until are complete extremelossment were necessed. If we should disc while sking the effort, let we resember the words of Mysse, if they more full who die is a just come.

hat be believed we were meaning the good time when all non throughout the brand expense of this country would enjoy equal legal and political privilege and demonstrate.

The address was eloquently delivered and listened to with the utnost attention by the wast andience, except when interrupted by appliance.
