ROBERT PURVIS said: It is said that our work is being done by the government, that the present war must end in the emancipation of the slaves. Sir, I never doubted the success of our cause. But, sir, why abandon any means now employed? The government protests that it has no purpose to abolish slavery—it refuses the services of coloured men as soldiers—its generals are guilty of the inhumanity and subserviency of sending back fugitive slaves —and the President has endeavoured to neutralize the advance step taken by the noble Fremont in his proclamation making free men of the slaves of rebel masters. Our duty, to my mind, is clear. We should continue in the prosecution of our labours until the work is done; and that work will not have been accomplished so long as a slave remains upon our soil. I would not wish, however, to be understood as reflecting upon the government by unjust censures. Mistaken as doubtless is her policy, in ungenerous treatment of the coloured people in many respects, I am not unmindful that to the present administration is due the honour of the important act of nullifying the Dred Scott decision, and the branding with infamy of the sentiment of that old jesuit and demagogue—"that the black man has no rights which the white man is bound to respect"—Secretary Seward having furnished in due form a passport of citizenship to a black man. Neither can I overlook the fact of the government's acceptance of the services of such men as Lane, Montgomery, John Brown, jun., etc

ROBERT PURVIS said: It is said that our work is being done by the government, that the present war must end in the emancipation of the slaves. Sir, I never doubted the success of our cause. But, sir, why abandon any means now employed? The government protests that it has no purpose to abolish slavery—it refuses the services of coloured men as soldiers-its generals are guilty of the inhumanity and subserviency of sending back fugitive slaves -and the President has endeavoured to neutralize the advance step taken by the noble Fremont in his proclamation making free men of the slaves of rebel Our duty, to my mind, is clear. should continue in the prosecution of our labours until the work is done; and that work will not have been accomplished so long as a slave remains upon our soil. I would not wish, however, to be understood as reflecting upon the government by unjust censures. Mistaken as doubtless is her policy, in ungenerous treatment of the coloured people in many respects, I am not unmindful that to the present administration is due the honour of the important act of nullifying the Dred Scott decision, and the branding with infamy of the sentiment of that old jesuit and demagogue—"that the black man has no rights which the white man is bound to respect"—Secretary Seward having furnished in due form a passport of citizenship to a black man. Neither can I overlook the fact of the government's acceptance of the services of such men as Lane, Montgomery, John Brown, jun., etc.